Standing on an elevated site, bordered to the west by tall pines and shade trees, the Myron Harris House is located in the rapidly developing commercial area of Route 4. A large modern shopping mall lies a short distance to the northeast and the University of Connecticut's Health Center is located to the south.
Erected in 1921 the Myron Harris House is capped by a cross gable roof. The facade which faces gable-to-street, features a partial open porch enhanced with turned columns, a balustrade, and spindlework frieze. The porch displays a lattice-like skirt. One-over-one sash dominate throughout. The house exhibits little else in the way of architectural detailing.

This dwelling was erected by Myron Harris around 1921 on a two-acre parcel of land he purchased from Julia I.C. Barnard (FLR 80:267). The Harris family had previously lived along Ely Road (see 98 Ely Road) where Myron was engaged in farming. He also worked as a caretaker at a number of local farms. Born in Beekman, New York, Harris (1863-1932) was the son of William H. and Zemmy (Barton) Harris. He resided in this house with his second wife, Alma (Lindgren) Harris and their two youngest daughters, Carrie and Mabel. Alma (1865-1934), who was a native of Sweden, was the daughter of Andrew and Johanna (Ericsson) Lindgren. In 1933 the house was willed to Harris's daughter Carrie Munson, the wife of Paul Nathaniel Munson. The Munson's were married in 1928 and had one son Paul Nathaniel Lawrence Munson Jr. in 1934. The elder Paul Munson was employed as a milkman for many years and had a herd of dairy cows. In 1968 the Munson's son, the Reverend Paul N.L. Munson acquired the property from his mother's estate (FLR 190:56). The house was sold out of the family in the 1970's.

Although the surrounding area has experienced heavy commercial development, the Myron Harris House is one of the few remaining historic dwellings along this portion of Farmington Avenue.
